

Tuesday Afternoon Broadcast

April 4, 2016

12:15 PM Broadcast

Gabriel Rivera

(1:25)

Hello I'm Gabriel Rivera and welcome to this afternoon's edition of Pace University's, Believe it or Not. The show where you will learn fun and interesting facts about the University and it's community. For today's show lets head back to the nineteen seventies. The place, Pace University's Pleasantville campus. The University is establishing itself in Pleasantville. What was once a farm is being transformed into an institution of higher education. While there is great change happening on the grounds, one thing will remain the same. Pace University's Pleasantville new Environmental Center, which was created from an old barn left on the grounds from the old farm days. The Center is home to the rockstars of the campus. When they're out and about you can't help but, notice them. Specifically, when they are eating your textbook. They are the Environmental Center's goats and sheep. Everyday the Center would let them of their enclosure and they would have free range on campus. Unfortunately, they soon became a bit of a problem. As in Professor Angelo L. Spillo, Director of the Environmental Center words:

Tuesday Afternoon Broadcast

Page 2

“We started to get phone calls. Once a couple of students were sitting down studying outside, one of the goats came and started chewing up their book. One of the goats, I never saw this, but I’m told, got up on some guys car and started to munch on the convertible top and that was it.

Cut: 2

Runs:(0:17)

Out: (convertible top)

While having free ranging goats and sheep on campus are a thing of the past, the presence of animals will always be constant. Today, the University’s new Environmental Center sports a wide variety of animals ranging from pigs to birds of prey. I’m Gabriel Rivera, join us again on Pace University’s Believe it or Not.

xxx